

The murderous shadow

Jacob, who had been wrongly convicted of murder, was sitting in his prison cell and taking out newspaper from a paper bag sent to him by his long-time friend and attorney Adam. Jacob was used to this hopeless life, but he always wanted boldly to clear his name. As he opened the newspaper on the front page, he noticed a dilapidated house, which he knew very well. Ten years ago, there was a murder in this house for which he had been sentenced, but now this mysterious house should be sold. At that moment, his sad and tired eyes shone, for a while there was a gleam of hope in them. Jacob finally wanted to be absolved from blame and to indicate the real assassin. However, the police informed the television about his reckless escape and the real killer who found out about it knew exactly where Jack would want to go. Both now having the same goal: to obtain some evidence. Jacob, with a mask on his face, was about to open the door when he suddenly heard a loud rustle of leaves. With a backpack on his back, he walked down the stairs to the basement. He was going to look for a large wooden box with an old photograph of a killer with an opaque tattoo on the right side of his face. He was bound to leave the room, when he unexpectedly saw a shadow in a broken mirror that hadn't been moving. Immediately afterwards, two shots were fired from the house. One of them also hit a dazed Jacob, who fell to the ground. After trying to get up, he saw a rusty dagger in the corner which he wanted to use for self-defence. Only a strong quest for the truth and luck got him out of the house, which had already been surrounded by police. Both men were imprisoned and brought to justice, but only Jacob with his watertight alibi heard the acquittal.
